

Websites connecting Americans' generosity, servicemembers' needs

6/27/2006

By Oren Dorell, USA TODAY

Americans are increasingly turning to high-tech methods to send gifts and supplies to U.S. troops serving in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Veterans say today's care packages are more numerous and creative — and get to servicemembers much faster — than those of the past.

In previous wars, letters from home were sometimes accompanied by cigarettes or magazines. Today, several websites designed specifically for supporting the troops overseas allow anyone with a credit card to order cellphone minutes, snacks, books — even armor and sniper accessories.

Air Force Senior Airman Hollis Verneti went through the website Any Soldier (anysoldier.com) to request hair conditioner and other items for herself and 21 other women in her group while they were stationed in Afghanistan last year.

"Sometimes, the PX, they do the best they can, but the high-priority items, like laundry soap and coffee, go fast," says Verneti, who is now stationed at Al Asad Air Base in Iraq. She says she was deeply moved by the messages people included with their gifts. "The letters and the cards, they made me cry."

Sara Selco shows her husband, Marine Sgt. Mitch Selco, his newborn daughter, Sophia, last Saturday from her bed at St. Anthony Central Hospital in Denver. A Freedom Calls videoconference allowed Mitch to see Sophia less than 24 hours after her birth

Allison Barber, a deputy assistant secretary of Defense, says: "In today's environment, people like to customize everything they do. Back in the good old days you'd just write a letter to any servicemember. Now you have 225 choices." That's how many non-profit support organizations the Defense Department lists on the website of America Supports You (americasupportsyou.mil), a program created to spread the word about such efforts.

"There's definitely more support now than there ever was," says Judith Young, national president of American Gold Star Mothers, an organization of women who have had children die in military action. Young's son, Jeffrey, was a Marine who died in an attack on his barracks in Beirut in 1983.

"I think technology is the main difference," Young says. "These moms and the troops that are over there now, they get to talk to them every day. ... I was lucky if I talked to him once or twice a month."

Among websites offering support:

- Soldiers' Angels (soldiersangels.org). This site, started by the mother of an Iraq war veteran, takes donations for Kevlar blankets that can protect Humvee crews from roadside bombs and sniper fire. It also provides troops with "cool scarves" — fabric filled with polymer crystals that can provide up to 15 hours of relief from the heat after a 15-minute soaking in cold water.

- Operation Uplink (operationuplink.org). This Veterans of Foreign Wars program solicits online donations to provide servicemembers with prepaid phone cards to call home.

- AmericanSnipers.org. A group of police and military sharpshooters created the "Adopt a Sniper" program. Donors help provide supplies such as spotting scopes, holsters and ammunition wallets to snipers deployed in combat zones around the world.

- Freedom Calls Foundation (freedomcalls.org). This non-profit uses donations to provide free videoconferences between soldiers and their families. Marine Sgt. Mitch Selco, stationed in Fallujah, Iraq, got to see his daughter by teleconference after she was born in Denver. Another Marine in Iraq, Cpl. Terrence Lambert, saw his daughter's birth in Jacksonville, Ala., via satellite on Fathers Day.

- Operation Gratitude (opgratitude.com). The program celebrated its 150,000th care-package delivery to servicemembers on Father's Day weekend.

Marty Horn, a Vietnam-era military policeman, founded Any Soldier in 2003 when his son, Brian, went to Afghanistan with the Army. Horn has 3,000 contacts in the military who post messages on his site about what their buddies need. Goods are distributed to 92,000 troops in 11 countries and at sea.

We have to be the best-supported troops in history," Horn says.

Clarkson, a Vietnam War veteran working in public relations for the Army Corps of Engineers in Iraq, says that what the troops receive now is "completely different" from the packages servicemembers received in Vietnam. Those care packages typically came from family members and contained items like Kool-Aid, socks and popcorn.

"I can't recall anyone getting boxes and boxes of stuff," Clarkson says.

Robert Houston, a civilian working at Fort Monroe in Virginia, says the only package he received during his time in Vietnam were some cookies from his mother. "They were stale and broken up by the time I received them," he says.

Horn says there can be problems associated with being able to send almost anything anywhere. He says many troops ask for synthetic Under Armour T-shirts because they're more comfortable than Army-issue cotton — even though the Marine Corps banned synthetic materials this spring for Marines outside their operating bases. A Marine was badly burned when his synthetic T-shirt melted on his skin in a roadside bomb attack near Ramadi in Iraq.

Sometimes technology cannot improve on the old ways. Sgt. Brian Horn, 26, who recently returned from leading a sniper team in Iraq and Afghanistan, said the thing that's most appreciated is still an old-fashioned letter. "(There are) always smiles and some disbelief, and some teared up a little bit," Horn says in describing how troops react to a letter.

"It's kind of hard to explain," he says. "You have to go out for a week and get shot at a bunch and not hear from anyone, from your family, and (you) come back and it's there — a letter from someone who's (in the USA) right now — and it's positive energy, it's 'thank you,' and it's real."